PREFATORY NOTE TO F.

THE half-volume of the Dictionary containing the words beginning with F includes 9,339 Main words, 1,419 Subordinate entries, and 2,849 Special combinations explained under the Main words, making a total of 13,607 words, besides 3,459 Obvious combinations recorded and for the most part illustrated by quotations, without separate explanation. Of the Main words, 2,364, or 25¼%, are marked (†) as obsolete, and 215, or 2¼%, are marked (‖) as alien or imperfectly naturalized.

Except for the total absence of words directly taken from Greek, the portion of the English vocabulary treated in this half-volume is representative of all the various sources which have contributed to the formation of the language. The words that have come down from Old English are very numerous, and many of them have necessarily occupied an unusually large proportion of space, on account of the great variety of senses and applications which they have acquired in the course of their long history. The verb fall and its related substantive, with their derivatives and combinations, occupy nearly ten pages. Among other long articles may be mentioned those on fast, father, fear, feel, fetch, field, fill, find, fire, fish, flesh, flow, fly, food, foot, foul, friend, full. Under all these words will be found recorded, and authenticated by quotations, many senses hitherto overlooked by lexicographers. The articles on the words for, forth, and from, have cost much thought and research, and it is hoped that they will form a substantial contribution to English grammar, and will be found serviceable in elucidating many hitherto obscure passages in our older writers. The Scandinavian element in the language is represented by several important words, including fellow (the academic use of which has never before been correctly explained in an English dictionary), flat, and fling. The words of Romanic and Latin derivation are perhaps even more numerous than those of Old-English descent, and are unusually interesting. It so happens that while the Romanic and Latin derivatives occurring under the first five letters of the alphabet are for the most part merely literary, or belong to the technical or the scientific vocabulary, those under F include a large number of the familiar words of everyday speech, such as fable, face, fact, fade, fail, faint, fairy, faith, false, fame, family, famine, fancy, fantastic, farce, farm, fashion, fate, fatigue, fault, favour, feast, feat, feature, feign, felon, female, fence, fender, ferment, ferret, festive, fiction, fierce, fig, figure, file, finance, fine, finish, firm, fix, flame, flavour, flounce, flour, flourish, flower, focus, foil, folly, foment, fool, force, foreign, forfeit, forge, fork, form, formal, fort, fortify, fortress, fortune, fossil, foundation, fountain, fraction, frail, franchise, frank, frantic, fray, frenzy, frequent, friction, fringe, fritter, frivolous, frock, front, frontier, frown, frugal, fruit, fry, fugitive, fume, function, fund, funeral, fungus, funnel, fur, furnace, furnish, furniture, fury, fuse, fusion, fusty, futile, future, etc. As these words, though of foreign origin, have long been completely established in popular currency, they have in most instances developed many new senses in addition to those which they had already acquired in the languages from which they are taken, and the articles devoted to them are therefore usually of considerable length. A remarkable characteristic of the portion of the vocabulary here treated is the abundance of onomatopœic formations, and of words which, though having a definite etymology, have been felt to have an inherent expressiveness in their sound which has influenced their development of meaning: such, for example, as fizz, flab, flap, flash, fleer, flick, flip, flop, flounce, flounder, flump, flurry, flush, flutter, fumble, fuzz.

The almost total absence of terms of purely scientific application beginning with F is partly due to the fact that the great mass of English scientific terms are either formed from Greek elements, or contain Latin prefixes. As has been already stated, no word of immediate Greek derivation begins in modern English orthography with F. If a phonetic system of spelling had been adopted in English, the proportion of scientific terms under the letter would have been very large, as it would have included the many Greek derivatives which are now spelt with initial PH-. The letter F is also remarkable in containing no words beginning with Latin prefixes, which in all the earlier letters occur in considerable numbers. Most of the scientific terms which are found in this portion of the Dictionary are special applications of words which are popularly current in non-technical senses. In the explanation of these the assistance of eminent specialists has been obtained. Although much of the 'encyclopædic' matter which it has been the custom to insert in English dictionaries is of set purpose excluded from this work as being alien to its scope, the current senses of scientific terms are often given with greater precision than in previous dictionaries, and many interesting facts with regard to their origin and history have for the first time been brought to light.

Among the articles which contain material of value to students of legal history may be mentioned those on farm, fee, felony, feoffee, feu, feud, fine, franchise, frankpledge, frithborh. In most of the Law

Dictionaries, and hence in some dictionaries of the English language, there appear many alleged terms of early English law which have no real existence, having been evolved from misreadings or misunderstandings of the texts. It has not always been thought worth while to occupy space in recording these figments; but in a few cases (as under fierding-court), where the error has obtained some general currency, its origin has been briefly pointed out.

In the etymologies, the conclusions reached by earlier investigators have been carefully considered in the light of the new evidence afforded by the quotations, and of the general results of recent philological research. Among the articles containing etymological facts or suggestions not found in earlier dictionaries may be mentioned those on the words factotum, fade, failure, fake, fall, fallow, faller, far, farther, farce, farm, fathom, favel, favella, fee, feeze, felon, feud, flamfew, flamingo, flannel, flask, flavour, flee, fleech, flippant, flounder, focile, fog, and foggy, fogger (with which compare the later articles fooker, fowker, fulker), foist vb., follow, frantic, free, fresh, fret, frill, frith sb.[2], frizzle, frock, froe, frog, frough, fudge, full v.[1] (to baptize), funnel, fur, further, fuss, fylfot. In this department I have received continued help from Prof. Sievers, now of Leipzig, Prof. Napier, Oxford, and Monsieur Paul Meyer, and on particular questions from other scholars, among whom are the Principal of Jesus College, Oxford, the Rev. Canon D. Silvan Evans, Dr. H. Sweet, Oxford, Prof. J. H. Gallée, Utrecht, and Monsieur A. Hatzfeld.

The material for the letter F, so far as it existed in 1875, was sub-edited, according to the original plan of the Dictionary, by the Rev. G. Wheelwright, who printed a specimen (8 pages 4to) containing Fa—Face. The earlier portion was afterwards taken in hand by the Rev. G. B. R. Bousfield, B.A., and Mr. J. Peto, the former of whom sub-edited F—Fi, and the latter Fl- to Floun. I have to record, with great regret, the removal by death of both these valued helpers in the work of the Dictionary. Owing to this and to other circumstances, it was not found possible to obtain outside help in the preliminary arrangement of the material from Flu- onwards.

I have to acknowledge with gratitude the continued and unremitting labour of Mr. Fitzedward Hall, D.C.L., who has enriched every page with new and valuable quotations. Lord Aldenham, the Rev. Dr. J. T. Fowler, of Durham, and Mr. W. H. Stevenson, M.A., Exeter College, Oxford, have also read all the first proofs, and have often suggested important improvements.

Occasional assistance in special departments has been received from most of those whose names are mentioned in the Prefatory Note to the letter E, especially from Mr. A. Beazeley, C.E.; Sir F. Pollock, Bart.; Mr. R. B. Prosser; Mr. W. Sykes, M.R.C.S. (now of Gosport). The constant (almost daily) help rendered by Dr. Furnivall it would be impossible adequately to acknowledge. Thanks for information or advice on the treatment of particular words are also due to Mr. A. Caland, Wageningen, Holland; Mr. W. T. Thiselton-Dyer, Royal Gardens, Kew; Mr. H. T. Gerrans, M.A., Oxford; Mr. James Hammond, M.A.; Mr. George Heppel, M.A.; Mr. A. F. Leach, M.A.; Prof. Maitland, Cambridge; the Rev. H. Rashdall, M.A.; Mr. J. M. Rigg; and Mr. R. J. Whitwell.

My assistants in the preparation of this half-volume (to whom I owe most cordial thanks for their painstaking and zealous co-operation) are Mr. G. F. H. Sykes, B.A.; Mr. Walter Worrall, B.A.; Mr. W. J. Lewis; Mr. H. J. Bayliss, and (latterly) Miss E. S. Bradley. In the proof-reading I have, as before, been ably assisted by Mr. A. Erlebach, B.A. My removal to Oxford, which took place in the middle of 1896, has, by enabling me to confer with my assistants personally instead of by correspondence, materially facilitated my work, and the results are already visible in the greatly increased rapidity with which the copy has been produced.

HENRY BRADLEY.

OXFORD, October 1897.

EMENDATIONS.

Falcon-gentle. 'The falcon-gentle is the female of the peregrine, not of the goshawk . . and her male is the tercel-gentle.' (D. H. Madden, Diary of Master William Silence, 1897, p. 376.)

Faldstool. The explanation given of the OE. form fyldestōl is incorrect; cf. the gloss 'volumina, fyldas' in Zeitschrift f. deutsches Alterthum, IX. 494.

Fastgong, Fastingong. The ON. forms fǫstu-gangr, fǫstu-inngangr, should have been referred to. From the latter it appears that the correct analysis of fastingong is fast sb. + ingang.

Feindill. The article should be deleted, the word in the quot. being a mistake for seindill (=seldom).

For, prep. 7 c. The expression 'to name (a child) for (=after) a person' is erroneously marked 'now only U.S.' It is still current in Sc.

Forayer. A reference should be given to the articles FOURRIER, FURRIER[1].

Fox sb. 16. Fox-whelp b was app. a kind of cider. Cf. the following quot.:

1664 EVELYN Pomona iv. 14 For the kinds then of Cider-Apples in being . . Some commend the Fox-Whelp.

Foy, v. Mr. G. H. Haswell informs us that on the north-east coast (esp. at Shields), a foy-boat was a small boat used (before the introduction of steam-tugs) to tow vessels in and out of harbour. The boat carried a small anchor or 'kedge', and was rowed a certain distance ahead of the vessel being towed; the kedge was then dropped, and the men on the ship 'hove upon' the kedge with a windlass until the vessel came over it, when the kedge was taken up and the process repeated. The operation was called foying, and the men employed foy-men. (See The Maister: a Century of Tyneside Life, p. 39.)

F.

F (ef), the sixth letter of the Roman alphabet, represents historically the 6th letter (waw) of the Semitic alphabet, which expressed the sounds of w (approximately) and the related vowel u. In early Greek writing the letter had at first the same twofold power; but subsequently its accidental varieties of form came to be differentiated in function, the form F (retaining the 6th place in the alphabet) being appropriated to the consonantal use, while V or Y served for the vowel, and is the source of the Roman U, V, Y, as explained under those letters. As the sound w was lost in the chief literary Greek dialects of the classical period, its sign f (called by the grammarians from its form the DIGAMMA) is not included in the later Gr. alphabet. In the Roman adoption of the Gr. alphabet the sound given to the 6th letter was the voiceless labiodental spirant (f). In OE. the letter retained the sound (f) unless it stood between two vowels, when it was pronounced as the corresponding voiced spirant (v). In the S.W., according to some scholars, the voiced sound was used also initially. In mod. Eng. F is always sounded (f), exc. in the word of, where it is voiced to (v) through absence of stress.

In MSS. a capital F was often written as ff. A misunderstanding of this practice has caused the writing of Ff or ff at the beginning of certain family names, e.g. Ffiennes, Ffoulkes.

Fade (fēid), *a.*² Also 3 vad, 5 faed. [a. F. fade vapid, insipid, dull, faded; according to M. Gaston Paris (Mém. de la Soc. de Ling. I. 90) repr. L. vapidum (see VAPID) cf. OF. rade :—L. rapidum, maussade :—L. male sapidum.

The great difficulty is the anomalous representation of L. v by f; the apparent parallel in OF. feiz (mod. fois) :—vicem is questionable, the f in that case being prob. due to sentence-combination. The ordinary view that fade descends from L. fatuum foolish, also insipid (whence Pr. fatz fem. fade, in same senses), is inadmissible on phonological grounds; but it is possible that early confusion with this word may have given rise to the change of v into f. No OF. vade* has been found: if it existed it would explain the Eng. vade, var. of FADE v., which is otherwise difficult to account for, as the Eng. dialects that have v for f usually retain f in Romanic words. Cf. Fr. dial. (Lyons) vadou (fem. vadoussi), repr. L. type vapidōsum.*]

3. Theol. in various specific applications. a. Belief in the truths of religion; belief in the authenticity of divine revelation (whether viewed as contained in Holy Scripture or in the teaching of the Church), and acceptance of the revealed doctrines. b. That kind of faith (distinctively called saving or justifying faith) by which, in the teaching of the N.T., a sinner is justified in the sight of God. This is very variously defined by theologians (see quots.), but there is general agreement in regarding it as a conviction practically operative on the character and will, and thus opposed to the mere intellectual assent to religious truth (sometimes called speculative faith). c. The spiritual apprehension of divine truths, or of realities beyond the reach of sensible experience or logical proof. By Christian writers often identified with the preceding; but not exclusively confined to Christian use. Often viewed as the exercise of a special faculty in the soul of man, or as the result of supernatural illumination.

The MHG. vach had the sense 'fold' in addition to those of 'appointed place, portion of space or time, compartment'; if a similar sense belonged to the etymological equivalents OE. fæc (recorded in sense 'space of time'), MDu. vak (enclosure, partition), the word might come from either source. If it be identical with the Sc. Faik sb. fold, a native origin seems probable.]

Fake (fēk), *v.*2 slang. [Of obscure origin. There appears to be some ground for regarding it as a variant of the older FEAK, FEAGUE, which are prob. ad. Ger. fegen (or the equivalent Du. or LG.) to furbish up, clean, sweep.

In Rowland's Martin Mark-all 1610, a feager of loges is explained as meaning 'one who begs with false documents' (cf. to fake a screeve); and the modern fake away appears to correspond to the earlier feague it away. The colloquial and jocular uses of the Ger. fegen closely resemble the senses mentioned in quot. 1812: amongst those given by Grimm are 'to clear out, plunder' (a chest, purse: cf. to fake a cly), 'to torment, ill treat'.]

[late OE. fals adj. and sb., ad. L. fals-us false (neut. fals-um, used subst. in sense fraud, falsehood), orig. pa. pple. of fallĕre to deceive; cf. ON. fals sb. The adj. is found in OE. only in one doubtful instance (see sense 13); its frequent use begins in the 12th c., and was prob. due to a fresh adoption through the OF. fals, faus (mod.F. faux = Pr. fals, Sp., Pg., It. falso). The continental Tent. langs. adopted the word in an altered form: MHG. valsch, mod.G. falsch (cf. OHG. gifalscôn to falsify), OFris. falsch, Du. valsch, late Icel. (15th c.) falskr, Da., Sw. falsk.

The etymological sense of L. falsus is 'deceived, mistaken' (of persons), 'erroneous' (of opinions, etc.). The transition to the active sense 'deceitful' is shown in phrases like falsa fides 'breach of trust, faithlessness', where the sb. has a subjective and an objective sense. In mod. Eng. the sense 'mendacious' is so prominent that the word must often be avoided as discourteous in contexts where the etymological equivalent in other Tent. langs. or in Romanic would be quite unobjectionable. Some of the uses are adopted from Fr., and represent senses that never became English.]

Falt, obs. form of FAULT.

Falter, var. of FAULTER, Obs., defaulter.

Falter (fɒ̈·ltəɹ, fɒ·ltəɹ), v.[1] Forms: 5 faltir, 6 (in Fisher flalter, floghter), folter, 6–9 faulter, (7 foulter), 7 felter, 4– falter. [Of obscure etymology.

The current view, which connects the word with fault, is untenable, on the ground that falter has always been written with the l, and is so pronounced in the dialects in which it occurs, whereas in fault the l is an etymologizing insertion, which rarely occurs in spelling before 16th c., and was not pronounced, even by educated speakers, till much later. (But it is not unlikely that association with fault may have coloured the recent use of the word.) It seems possible that sense 1, 'to stumble', may have been developed from the sense 'to be entangled' (FALTER n.[2]). On the other hand it is noteworthy that ME. falde-n, FOLD v. is used of the limbs and the tongue in the sense 'to give way, fail, falter'; perh. falter may be a frequentative of fald-en, formed irregularly through the influence of approximately synonymous vbs. like balter, totter, welter.]

OF. fantasie (Fr. fantaisie), (= Pr. fantazia, Sp., Pg. fantasía, It. fantasia), ad. L. phantasia, a. Gr. φαντασία lit. 'a making visible', f. φαντάζειν to make visible, f. φαίνειν to show.

The senses of φαντασία from which the senses of the word in the mod. langs. are developed are: 1. appearance, in late Gr. esp. spectral apparition, phantom (so L. phantasia in Vulg.); 2. the mental process or faculty of sensuous perception; 3. the faculty of imagination. These senses passed through OF. into Eng., together with others (as delusive fancy, false or unfounded notion, caprice, etc.) which had been developed in late L., Romanic, or Fr. The shortened form Fancy, which apparently originated in the 15th c., had in the time of Shakspere become more or less differentiated in sense. After the revival of Greek learning, the longer form was often spelt phantasy, and its meaning was influenced by the Gr. etymon. In mod. use fantasy and phantasy, in spite of their identity in sound and in ultimate etymology, tend to be apprehended as separate words, the predominant sense of the former being 'caprice, whim, fanciful invention', while that of the latter is 'imagination, visionary notion'.]

Farce (fās), sb.[2] Also 6–7 farse, 6 Sc. farsche. [a. (in 16th c.) F. farce, app. a metaphorical use of farce stuffing: see prec.

The history of the sense appears to be as follows: In the 13th c. the word (in latinized form farsa, farsia) was applied in France and England to the various phrases interpolated in litanies between the words kyrie and eleison (e.g. 'Kyrie, genitor ingenite, vera essentia, eleison'); to similar expansions of other liturgical formulæ; and to expository or hortatory passages in French (sometimes in rime) which were inserted between the Latin sentences in chanting the epistle. (The related vb. L. farcire, OF. farcir to stuff, hence to 'pad out', interlard, was used in the same connexion in the expressions epistola farcita, un benedicamus farci. See Du Cange s.vv. Farsa, Farsia, and Burney Hist. Music II. 256.) Subsequently the OF. farce, with similar notion, occurs as the name for the extemporaneous amplification or 'gag', or the interludes of impromptu buffoonery, which the actors in the religious dramas were accustomed to interpolate into their text. Hence the transition to the modern sense is easy. (The Eccl. Lat. farsa, farcire, referred to above, have been anglicized by mod. writers on liturgical antiquities as FARSE sb. and v.)]

Sk. par, pṛ to carry through or across, Gr. πόρος way, passage, ford, L. portāre to carry; also the words mentioned under FAR, FOR.

The change from the strong to the weak conjugation seems to have been due in part to the influence of the derivative vb. FERE, which in Eng. had the same sense, though in the other Teut. langs. its equivalent expressed the transitive sense 'to carry'. In the present stem this vb. became obsolete before 14th c.; but its pa. t. and pa. pple. ferde (in northern dialects also farde) continued in use, virtually serving as inflexions of fare. The irregular wk. vb. thus produced (fare, ferd) became regular (fare, fared) before the 16th c. The strong pa. t., already comparatively infrequent in ME., seldom appears after 15th c. exc. in Sc.; of the strong pa. pple. we have no examples after 16th c.]

Farther (fā·ɹðəɹ), adv. and a. Forms: 3–6 ferder, ferdre, 4 ferþer(e, 4–6 ferthere, 4–8 farder, 5– farther. [ME. ferþer (whence by normal phonetic development farther) is in origin a mere variant of FURTHER, due prob. to the analogy of the vb. ferþren :—OE. fyrðrian to FURTHER. The primary sense of further, farther is 'more forward, more onward'; but this sense is practically coincident with that of the comparative degree of far, where the latter word refers to real or attributed motion in some particular direction. Hence further, farther came to be used as the comparative of far; first in the special application just mentioned, and ultimately in all senses, displacing the regular comparative farrer. In standard Eng. the form farther is usually preferred where the word is intended to be the comparative of far, while further is used where the notion of far is altogether absent; there is a large intermediate class of instances in which the choice between the two forms is arbitrary.]

Teut. and Aryan: OE. fæder corresponds to OFris. feder, fader, OS. fadar, fader (LG., Du. vader, vaar), OHG. fater (MHG. and mod.G. vater), ON. faðer, -ir (Sw., Da. fader, far), Goth. fadar (found only Gal. iv. 6, the ordinary word being atta) :—OTeut. fader, ? fadēr :—OAryan patēr (patər-, ptr-). whence Skr. pitṛ, Gr. πατήρ, L. pater, OIr. athir.

The spelling in our quots. is uniformly with d until 16th c., exc. that faþer occurs sporadically in the Cotton and Göttingen MSS. of the Cursor Mundi (a 1300); but the pronunciation (ð) may have been widely current in the 15th c. or even earlier; in 14–15th c. the spelling with -der is very common in words like brother, feather, leather, though this spelling cannot in all cases be supposed to indicate that the writers pronounced the words with (d). The mod.Eng. -ther (ðəɹ) for OE. -der, -dor in father and mother is often wrongly said to be due to the analogy of brother, or to Scandinavian influence; it is really the result of a phonetic law common to the great majority of Eng. dialects; other examples in standard Eng. are gather, hither, together, weather. At present nearly all dialects pronounce father and mother with (ð) as in standard Eng.; in various parts of the north of England and the north Lowlands (d), alveolar or dental, is sometimes heard. The representation of OE. æ, a by (ā) in this word is anomalous; the only parallel case, setting aside the class of instances in which the symbol (d) is used in this Dict., is rather. Among the chief variant pronunciations in dialects are fa·ðəɹ, fɑ·ðəɹ (by writers of dialect books often spelt faither, feyther), fɪ·ðəɹ, Sc. fe·ðəɹ, etc.

In OE. the genitive had the two forms fæder (cf. OS. fader, OHG. fater, ON. fǫður) and fæderes. The uninflected form survived in occasional use down to the 15th c.]

e. As a prefix to the name of a priest. Also abbreviated F., Fr.

Formerly, as still in Continental use, restricted to the regular clergy (see b). In the present century this has become the customary English mode of designating a Roman Catholic priest, even among those not of his own communion: but some secular priests still refuse the title as incorrect, preferring to be addressed as 'The Rev. A. B.' The abbreviated forms are seldom used exc. by Roman Catholics.

As the prefix 'Father' was in the 16th c. used only with the names of members of religious orders, its use was of course not continued in the reformed Church of England. Of late years the title has been applied, among a section of the High Church party, to Anglican priests, and some prominent members of that section are very commonly designated by it.

Faubourg (fōˑbu͝r). Forms: 5 faubourgh, fabo(u)r, 6 faubor, (foubour), (fourbourg), 7–8 fauxburgh, 7–9 fauxburg, 9 fauberg, 7– faubourg. [late ME. faubourg, fabo(u)r, a. F. faubourg. From the 15th c. to the beginning of the 17th c. the word was more or less naturalized, esp. in Scotland; it is now used only as foreign, with Fr. pronunciation or (more frequently) semi-anglicized as fōˑbūˑr, -bū͡ɵɪg.

Littré considers faubourg, formerly also spelt faux-bourg (='false borough') to be a corruption of the earlier-recorded synonym forsbourg (f. fors outside + bourg borough), which is the source of some of the Eng. forms given above. The word faubourg, faux-bourg, seems not to be known in F. before 15th c., but its existence in 1380 is implied by L. falsus burgus in a charter cited by Du Cange. Its origin may possibly be found in the MHG. phálburgere (also spelt falborgere), which according to German scholars originally meant 'burghers of the pale', i.e. 'persons living outside the city wall but within the palisade'; it afterwards denoted a special class of non-resident burghers, having only partial civic rights. The word occurs frequently in the imperial charters of 13-14th c., sometimes latinized as phalburgenses; and a charter of 1365, according to a French translation given by Laguille (1727) speaks of 'des faux bourgeois dits en allemand Pfalbourguers'. From these facts it seems not unlikely that faubourg, faux-bourg, may have been evolved from phalburgensis or its punning translation falsus burgensis, faux bourgeois.]

A portion of a town or city, lying outside the gates; a suburb. (In Paris the name is still retained by various parts of the city which were originally suburbs, but have long been included within the walls.)

2. A tap for drawing liquor from a barrel, etc. Now dial. and U.S.

Formerly more fully spigot and faucet, denoting an old form of tap, still used in some parts of England, consisting of a straight wooden tube, one end of which is tapering to be driveninto a hole in the barrel, while the other end is closed by a peg or screw. The peg or screw when loosened allows the liquor to flow out through a hole in the under side of the tube. Properly, the spigot seems to have been the tube, and the faucet the peg or screw (as still in the Sheffield dialect); but in some examples the senses are reversed, and each of the words has been used for the entire apparatus. In the U.S. faucet is now the ordinary word for a tap of any kind.
